

Philosophy of music education

By: Cornelia Enander

Music is one of the best forms of cultivating community and encouraging inclusivity and diversity. It allows students of many ages and backgrounds to come together and participate in being creative and have a musical experience. With music you can cross over cultural and linguistic boundaries, offering experiences to open the mind to other kinds of music from different cultures and different eras.

We all have different levels of appreciation different styles of music, all of which depends on the students' personal taste. One of the goals of music education is to broaden these boundaries and expose students to new kinds of music and cultivate a general knowledge and an appreciation of it. Presenting new ideas and skills through music education is one way of broadening students' musical frontiers which can influence many areas of their life.

A great teacher is one who is able to cultivate relationships with their students and knows their students' strengths and weaknesses. A teacher is able to show them how to use them to advance their musical knowledge and improve their musical ability. Music education is for everyone no matter their musical ability; with beneficial music teaching strategies, anyone can grow to appreciate many different kinds of music and grows in their own musical knowledge and skill.

I strive to provide students with a well-rounded music education and encourage music appreciation. I plan to do this through musical instruction in knowledge and skill as well as offering opportunities for fun and unique musical experiences. As a teacher, I hope to encourage students to be creative in an environment where they can explore and learn new things about music. A big part of early music education is creativity and the will and ambition to learn, and it is up to the teachers to inspire students through meaningful musical experiences. The goal of music is to bring people together in a meaningful musical experience. It is a chance for students to come together and immerse themselves making beautiful music.
